

The usage of cell phones inflight is a security threat inflight. First, it could lead to different people on an aircraft acting together as a terrorist cell or group to communicate and share vital information... could you imagine someone observing the crew while seated in first class and talking to his counterparts in the back of the plane??? Second, it will be a customer service distaster! could you imagine someone seated over the wings or near engines and talking out loud? Then the flight attendants would have to deal with passenger complaints and disruptions. It could lead to arguments and fights inflight. Would the FCC like to be responsible of another another threat to passengers and crews alike?

This is only one of many examples that can be given against using cell phones inflight. Thank you for your time and I hope I never see this happening... it is bad enough to deal with passengers trying to use blackberries and cellphones as it is while flying to sms and talk to others!
